Illinois Department of Public Health (IDPH) recently recognized the village of Glencoe for its compliance with state regulations on the proper amounts of fluoridation in the water.

The Glencoe water plant – which has been in operation for nearly a century – had perfect conformity with existing state regulations, according to the IDPH. That maintains Glencoe's virtually spotless record, which has been in place since 1988.

Having the proper amount of fluoride in the water goes a long way toward preventing oral health issues, according to the IDPH.

The village will be honored for its water quality at a conference in Springfield next week.
